The first year of your part-time MBA experience is never an easy one, and Robert Hallback, MBA ’15, decided to further complicate his by opening a restaurant in Florida. While for some, this might normally be a recipe for academic disaster, Hallback relied heavily on his classmates and professors—both with his restaurant and in class—and flourished as a result.

Smith’s community rallied around Hallback, and his classmates communicated details on deliverables and assignments when he had to be out of class. His professors connected him with other established restaurateurs, and everyone provided feedback and support for his venture in real time.

“It worked out so well for me—the regressions we ran in our data analytics class were based on my restaurant. And when we developed a strategic marketing plan, my classmates again chose to use my restaurant as the basis for the project. The benefits I’ve received from this program and from this community are enormous. I am so glad that I chose Smith for my MBA.”

-Robert Hallback, MBA ’15

Conducting Business IN THE CLASSROOM

Hank Boyd knows that teaching part-time MBA students is different—that they bring a wealth of real-world knowledge and experience with them, and aren’t looking to be bowled over with theory that has no use in practice. And he loves that. So Hank teaches with a style that draws out students’ strengths, not by looking for the “right” answer in class, but for the moment that fans the spark of a question into a full-blown discussion. Encouraging critical thinking and community while pushing students to step outside their comfort zones has certainly resonated well in the classroom. This shows as Boyd has been the recipient of numerous teaching awards during his decade with Smith.

“I see myself as a conductor in an orchestra. These students already know how to play their instruments, and it’s up to me to help them find their passion and deliver their best performances.”

-Hank Boyd, Professor
